FRANCE.

PARIS, May 2.—This morning the Emperor met the Legislative Body in solemn session. The galleries of the hall filled, and received from a distance the loud cheers of the people as the Emperor and his escort passed through the streets. His Majesty, with the Empress and the Prince Imperial, was greeted by the Senate and deputies with demonstrations of enthusiasm. Archbishop Sibour officiated as chaplain in behalf of the Legislative bodies.

PARIS, May 2.—The following is the Emperor's speech in reply to the address of the Legislative bodies on the announcement of the result of the vote on the plebiscitum:

GENTLEMEN—Before hearing your hearts the result of this vote, my first impulse is to express to you my gratitude for the support you have given me. But I am happy to see in it a new proof of the confidence which the people of which chamber themselves. The fact that the people of which chamber themselves. The fact that the people of which chamber themselves. The fact that

THE SEWERAGE QUESTION.

The Aldermen representing the Fifteenth Ward presented to the Common Council, on Monday evening, a statement of the condition of that ward as regards sewerage. They say:

"That said ward has not its just proportion of sewerage is evident from the fact that in the Tenth Ward there is now 46,387 feet of sewer, or one foot of sewer to each twenty-one square yards of territory, and 1,000 feet of sewer per square of sixty feet front; while there are of no assessable property, with the land valued at $1,000 per square, only 7,000 feet of sewer for each 60 square yards of territory. And that this last statement of the Board of Health shows that the Fifteenth Ward has, last year, in the cost more sewerage than any ward in the city, according to population, which is believed to be a general misapprehension."

This comparison is hardly fair, because, less than a year ago, two square miles of uninhabited land were added to that ward, while the two wards which it has not yet overtaken in sewerage are thickly settled enough. But if any man chooses to hold that the Council of the Vatican can give him some further lessons, we shall withhold at present our anathema. There is so much more need of healthy living than of hard cursing in this troubled world that if we do any of the latter it will be for some deeper provocation than the assumed mistakes which our neighbors may make in the effort to believe what they cannot understand.

THE McFARLAND LETTERS.

The New York World, in a recent number, denounced McFarland "as one of the meanest and most despicable of cowards," whose baseness in publishing his wife's letters, after the trial was over, displayed an unusual depth of degradation." These letters, it will be remembered, are published to neutralize the impression which Mrs. Richardson's account of the wretched life she had elected to lead with her husband, as the wife of a lazy, brutal, drunken and violent husband, has made, and it is assumed that the expressions of affection they contain, prove her statement to be false. Now, let us look at these letters with, of course, only in the light of evidence, and see whether the World is justified or not in the strong terms it uses. We find them to be of various dates, from 1858 to 1868, and we find them to be of a totally differing tone, according to the dates at which they were written. McFarland, having a purpose to serve, has, of course, out of all the mass of letters at his disposal, made choice of those most abounding in expressions of affection, as best serving that purpose. In the early letters, these expressions are frequent, and are entirely in accordance with her narrative, that she was not till some time after her marriage that she discovered his true character, and her affection for him was gradually destroyed. Accordingly, in the later letters, the tone is changed, and, though there still remain those terms of endearment which began as such as "Dear sir," or "My dear sir," and "Very truly yours," or "Sincerely your friend" in ordinary business letters between men, there is a marked absence usually of the expressions of affection and endearment which characterize the earlier letters. Anyone who carefully and candidly reads the correspondence cannot fail to mark this distinction. But there is still another point which the World has failed to notice, and that is the infidelity of the wife, even if proved, was no legal justification of murder, the alleged infidelity, though not proved, was the real justification, and that upon this defence alone McFarland was acquitted Richardson. Broadwell, therefore, waives insanity, and goes even to the extent of denying any emotional excitement; and declares, that upon discovering what he considered proof of his wife's infidelity, he formed the determination to kill her, and did so. The man clearly understood that for such a murder he had only to plead marital infidelity, or the suspicion of it.

However closely he may have brought his case within the precedent set by the McFarland jury, it does not relieve the crime of any of its hideous atrocity. It is a case of cold murder, without the least provocation or justifiable brutality. The allegation of the wife's infidelity is probably an invention, the suggestion of a depraved and bloodthirsty temper, whetted by the acquittal of another assassin on a similar plea. It was a premeditated murder. The would had lived and maintained herself in spite of his desertion, which was of course a crime in his eyes, and, after years of poverty and toil, was able to declare herself independent of his support. It was because she had not starved to death, and because she had, by her labor and industry, got along better without him than with him that he became so embittered against her, and that all the law in the land, and even Recorder Hackett's court, he resolved to kill the woman who had not starved when he abandoned her. The miserable wretch, lying in his cell, imagines that he has committed a heroic and chivalrous deed, and that the applause of the public is to offer some evidence to substantiate his assertions.

This murder, if not a direct result of the verdict in the McFarland case, might well have been inspired by it. The man Broadwell, after many years of ill-treatment and abandonment of his family, completes his own cowardly betrayal of wife and family by absconding the moment he was arrested. McFarland tried, and found that assassination was justified by men high in authority, and applauded by a popular demonstration in court. He read that assassination was justifiable upon the mere assumption or suspicion of marital infidelity, and when the McFarland jury, by their verdict, gave legal sanction to the doctrine, this man left his work in New Jersey, and, entering the city early the newly chipped shaffon their backs, and make very awkward work of it. Some would, and think the shaffon their backs, and make very awkward work of it. Some would, and think the shaffon their backs, and make very awkward work of it. Some would, and think the

A Wedding.

(From our own special correspondent.)

New York, May 16, 1870.

Verily, there is nothing new under the sun! for were not the daughters of Zion as haughty yesterday, in all the intensity of their sinfulness, as those described by Isaiah? Bonnets and the head-heads, the tinctures, the rings, the changeable suits of light that mention and the cringing pose of the body were with equal propriety forthcoming as they were with either of the fair daughters of the Holy City. [illegible] Even the ornaments of the [illegible] of the foundation and went. [illegible] Pound! And that the [illegible] of Mr. Isaiah—as Aunt Dinah reverently calls him—comprehended the possibility of chignons and chatelaines, who can doubt when he reads in the words of the prophet, that if it shall come to pass that, instead of a girdle, a rent; and instead of well-set hair, baldness; and burning, instead of beauty, [illegible] Mrs. Belshazzar contemplates the crowns, arrayed, like the King's daughter, in raiment of fine needlework, and the thought occurred to the [illegible] that [illegible] with envy. [illegible] established with [illegible] all glorious within; [illegible] and [illegible] pro-fusion of [illegible] herself at the Grand Assize. [illegible] families as her new spring costumes. And then, I wondered if, in the distribution of crowns, Isaiah's daughters will have on her purple velvet prayer-book, bail greenfinky, [illegible] were accordingly there here, was the only one she was called to bear, and then I kept on wondering, as I watched Mrs. Belshazzar's compound Nye and distended nostrils, as she hurried away from a thin, washland thrown before her in mute appeal for help, how it was possible for the hungry, wretched creature to keep alive even the spark of faith in God that Mary early one morning, standing in for Campeachy; no doubt with the intention of handing his touchstone for, although at that time Nineveh had held a rather scandalous position toward the government of God, passed by on the other side. The hand was very dirty, dainty Mrs. B., I confess; but then it was very thin; and you remember the father fell upon the neck of his prodigal boy, and kissed him. Well, as I was saying, the ring was put upon him. And, if you and I are inviting to sell our immortals gloves, and offend our delicate feelings, by crowding with unpoetic and uncompromising poverty and wretchedness around us, think you the Father will meet us while we a great way off, or cause our filthy rags to fall from us, and cover us with the garment that waxeth not old? Ah, Mrs. Belshazzar, I am afraid you will lose [illegible] of these.

A politician, signed by what the New York Tribune calls a number of prominent citizens, is in circulation, calling on Governor Hoffman to issue a proclamation setting forth that Maryland up in so insane asylum. Without exhorting at all into the merits of the case, I think the entire community would experience the most profound sense of relief if some humane disposition could be made of him. The papers have given up their columns, to the enclosure of more interesting matter than usual, for weeks to the publication of the trial. In addition to all this, an inmate by the McFarland case furnished the best of the points in the city. The marriage relation was dissected and scattered to a degree that may result in a positive famine in divorces. The opinion of some of the clerical Rosicrucs, by convincing both man and woman that the bonds were long enough to reach from Maine to Texas, or Mr. St. Paul, knew what he was about when he said, "He that marryeth, doeth well; but he that marryeth not, doeth better." To marry or not Hayworth took the committal bail by the horns, and, instead of having a private marriage service, which he declared was a times of live. A man solemnly swears at the altar to endow with all his worldly goods; what man, he asked, ever did it, or even intended to do it? This is in agreement with poor, friend Hayworth. The majority of husbands endow their wives with just what the law—the law, mind you, Mr. Isaiah—or good faith, nor honor, but the law—compels them to, and no more. While, on the other hand, he asserts the wife promises to obey; absolutely takes a vow of unconditional subjugation, which she has no intention of fulfilling. Obey, indeed! I should think not, until the masculine race is reconstructed, and men grown to the stature of power in intellect, wiser in judgment, and stronger in principle than women are. And so, in Fyre Hayworth's opinion, the head and front of the McFarlands offending was mutual deception of the husband of their married life. Highly decorous and respectable duplicity, sanctioned by the usages of custom that, instead of a girdle, a rent; and instead of well-set hair, baldness; and burning, [illegible] beauty, [illegible] Mrs. Belshazzar contemplates the crowns, arrayed, like the King's daughter, in raiment of fine needlework, and the thought occurred to the
